Trump Will Move To Expand Arctic, Atlantic Drilling.

The New York Times (4/27, Davenport) reports that according to Interior Secretary Zinke, President Trump “is scheduled on Friday to sign an executive order aimed at rolling back the Obama administration’s attempts to ban oil drilling off the southeastern Atlantic and Alaskan coasts.” Trump’s order “would also erase or narrow the boundaries of some federally-protected marine sanctuaries, opening them up to commercial fishing and oil drilling” and Interior Secretary Zinke told reporters it would “direct the Interior Department to ‘reconsider’ several recent regulations on offshore drilling to ease more oil exploration.” Zinke will be directed “to review an Obama administration plan that delineated where offshore drilling could and could not take place between 2017 to 2022” that “put the entire southeast Atlantic coast and large portions of the Arctic Ocean off limits to drilling.” Zinke said, “There’s no set goal [to the review]. But if there’s areas that are acceptable, that have resources, and local communities are for it and states are for it we could include it in next five-year plan.”

Continuing Coverage Of Trump Order To Review National Monuments.

In continuing coverage, The Hill (4/27, Cama) reports, “President Trump initiated a major review this week of his predecessors’ use of the Antiquities Act to protect land and water,” with the review “focused primarily on the controversial Bears Ears National Monument in Utah.” For years congressional Republicans have sought “to restrict the president’s ability to create monuments,” and “both parties see Trump’s order as a step toward Antiquities Act changes, since it allows [Interior Secretary] Zinke to identify changes either in the executive branch or Congress.” In an analysis, Bloomberg News (4/27, Deprez, Natter) reports, “Trump’s order is at least a tacit acknowledgment of the legal and political challenges in revoking national monument status” and “delays the court fight” over Bears Ears.

Zinke Meets With Utah Congressional Delegation On Bears Ears.

The Deseret (UT) News (4/27, O’Donoghue) reports Interior Secretary Zinke met with Utah Gov. Gary Herbert and members of the state’s congressional delegation “to lay out the next steps in the review of monument status for” Bears Ears and Grand Staircase-Escalante. Rep. Chris Stewart said that Zinke “understands the issues and the enormous impact it has had on my district.” While Zinke said he will visit Utah to meet with a variety of people on the review of the Bears Ears designation, “a Native American tribal coalition that pushed for the new monument said they have heard nothing from the new interior secretary.”

Zinke Announces Historic Preservation Grants.

The Virgin Islands Daily News (4/28, Carlson) reports Secretary of the Interior Zinke joined the National Park Service in announcing “$26.9 million in historic preservation grants to every state, territory, and partnering nation.” He said, “Through valuable partnerships we are able to assist communities and tribes in ensuring the diverse historic places, culture and traditions that make our country unique are protected for future generations.”

Alaska Town Hopes To Build Road In National Wildlife Refuge.

Alaska Dispatch News (4/27, Martinson) reports residents of King Cove, Alaska “are cautiously optimistic” that, under the Trump Administration, the Interior Department will allow them “to build an 11-mile road through the Izembek National Wildlife Refuge to the huge, World War II-era airport in Cold Bay.” Interior Department spokeswoman Heather Swift said, “Given the significant interest of the King Cove community, the department is reviewing the issues there and determining its best ability to address them.” Meanwhile, “Izembek road advocates are trying several avenues for a do-over: pushing legislation through the all-Republican Congress and getting [Interior Secretary] Zinke to make the change himself.”

BP Discovers Oil Underneath Salt Dome In Gulf Of Mexico.

The AP (4/27) reports BP used advanced imaging of geological formations to discover 200 million barrels of oil in a hidden cache in the Gulf of Mexico. The reserves were discovered through the use of a new supercomputer and mathematical algorithm to interpret seismic data. The advancements let scientists see beyond a salt dome, which traditionally distorts seismic waves. The Houston Chronicle (4/27, Hunn) reports the find is worth a potential $2 billion and is located in 7,000 feet of water in the Atlantis field about 150 miles from new Orleans.

Interior Removes Almost All Mentions Of Climate Change From Its Webpage On The Topic.

Talking Points Memo (4/27, Shuham) reports, “The Department of the Interior scrubbed nearly any mention of climate change from its webpage on the topic,” removing “a vigorous endorsement of the scientific consensus that the Earth is warming as a result of human activity.” Motherboard (4/27, Emerson) reports that the Interior Department said, in a statement: “As is standard with a change in administration, the Department’s website has been updated periodically.”
